

Basil Chulev

THE SIEGE OF SVETIGRAD ('SAINT-CITY')

1448/1449

Skopje, Macedonia 2016

Г К А Н Д Е Р Б Е Г

Introduction

In 15th century the medieval feudalism across Europe was ending. It was a period of continuous disturbance and great woe. The central powers were unable to assert above the local warlords quarrels, and Europe was fragmented by the rule of local lords. With no supervision or direction they were fighting endless wars between them, without conclusion. Macedonian peninsula was no different, divided in many small kingdoms and principalities that occasionally fought between them. On top of that it was invaded and ravaged by last in the row of invading barbarous tribes from east, the Seljuk Turks. The Turk hordes poured into Balkans already in the 14th century, and although Byzantium and its holy capital Constantinople managed to withstand their attacks until 1453, they gradually conquered one by one those small Macedonic kingdoms and divided among them principalities. Nevertheless, 15th century still saw many of them fighting fiercely and rebelling for freedom from Turkish tyranny. One of these was the mountainous Macedonian principality of Mat (or Matia) and Debar, in Western Macedonia and what is today northern Albania, ruled by George “Skanderbeg” Kastriot. These isolated lands were resisting successfully the Turkish raids for so long thanks also to the financial and material support which they continuously received from their allies across the Adriatic Sea, namely, the Spanish Aragon, Venetians, Ragusans, and the Pope.

After many failed Ottoman incursions in western Macedonia, Turk sultan Murat II decided to march a large army into Skanderbeg's dominions, in order to capture one of the key Macedonian strongholds, the fortress of Svetigrad. This city was one of the last Macedonian strongholds and a bastion of Christianity in western Macedonia. Its very name underlines that fact - “Svetigrad” means the ‘Holy-city’ or “Saint-city” in plain Macedonian. This city was most probably ubiquitous to what was known as a strong fortress from the ancient times under the name of ‘Uscana’, a place where the last Macedonian king from the Argead Dynasty of Macedon, Persei (Lat. Perseus), won a great victory against the invading Romans in 170 BCE. Namely, the king Persei marched with his Macedonian Falankas (lat. Phalanx) toward the fortres of Uscana in the first half of the 2nd century BCE. The Romans, helped by irregulars from various Gaul-Illyrian tribes in Matia and Dalmatia, succeeded in occupying the western Macedonian city-fortress of Uscana in the Third Macedonian-Roman War (171-168 BCE).¹ Thus, in the winter of 170/169 BCE the Macedonian king Persei responded swiftly by moving with his army from Stubera (today Chepigovo) in Pelagonia toward the region of Penestia in the westernmost Upper Macedonia, in order to put-down the Roman occupation of this important fortified city. The combined force of 4000 Roman soldiers and 500 Gaul/Illyrian tribesmen were no mach for the Macedonian Army of 10.000 Falanka infantry, 2000 light infantry and 500 Macedonian Royal Companions cavalry. After short and futile resistance Romans negotiated a disarmed retreat, while the Gaul/Illyrian marauders were captured and sold as slaves. The Macedonian garison at the Uscana stronghold was restored again, and the city was additionally fortified by Persei.

After several centuries of natural and human disasters and devastations that followed, the early 4th century marked a new era in the development of ancient Uscana and its surroundings. Since Constantine I the Great ‘Edict of Milan’ in AD 313 granted religious freedom to Christianity, many towns all over the then Roman empire became important religious centers, and the old fortress-town of Uscana was among them. As part of the Diocese of Macedonia the whole Debar region was rebuilt and arranged with churches and basilicas. For example, under the monastery of St. George in village of Knežino near Kičevo, in 1985 several older church buildings have been discovered, the oldest one dated exactly in the Early Christian period (4-5th c.).² Today nearby village Kodžadžik is also famous for the fact that the natal house of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk's³ was located in the village. A memorial house of Kemal Atatürk has been recently constructed in the same place.

¹ Titus Lyvius "History of Rome"

17 centuries after the Macedonian-Roman Wars, Uscana, now renamed into 'Svetigrad', was again a Macedonian stronghold in front of the foreign invaders, this time against the Turk hordes from the east. The Svetigrad fortress lays on an important route (near today Kodžadžik) between central Macedonia and Macedonian region of Matia (Mat), and its occupation would give the invading Ottomans easy access into the western parts of Macedonia (Matia) and further toward the Adriatic coast. Under the command of sultan Murat II a large Turk army was marching against Svetigrad and the confederation of Macedonian and other local tribes warlords. Known as "The League of Leshi"⁴ it was formed in 1444, and it was a confederation of Dalmatian, Matian, Debar and other Macedonian regions komites and voivodas ('warriors' and 'warlords'). Headed by the Macedonian prince and ingenious military commander - George "Skander-beg" Kastriot, 'the best among the equals', it caused great disturbance to the Turks invaders, which in 1444 were heavily defeated at the battle of the city of Torvioll (today 'Peshkopeia'). Further, encouraged by initial great success, Skanderbeg launched a series of assaults deeper in the Turk-occupied Macedonian territories, until he reached Skopje further east. Thus, his small Macedonian army halted and stood on the way of Turkish invasion.

The force prepared by Murat II was the largest force with which the Ottomans had ever attacked Skander-beg. Murat planned to take the fortress, march into the western Macedonia interior, and capture the main citadel of Kruša (today Kruje), thus crushing the Venetian-supported Macedonian League. The siege of Svetigrad began on May 14, 1448 when an Ottoman army, led by sultan Murat II, surrounded the fortress of Svetigrad. At the same time Skanderbeg engaged into war against his former ally Venice. This was due to the Republic of Venice treason toward the Macedonian League in this critical moment, and consequently Skanderbeg's decision to break off his subservient position in the informal alliance with the treacherous Venetians.

Realizing the magnitude of the challenge, Skanderbeg attempted to relieve the garrison of Svetigrad by engaging in skirmishes with the Ottoman army. His forces succeeded in inflicting heavy casualties on the Turkish forces through guerrilla-style attacks. Efforts were made by Skander-beg to use intelligence forces, operating as far as Constantinople, to gather information on Murat's plans of action.

Meanwhile, near Skadar (Škodra, Scutari)⁵ he had been able to defeat a Venetian force and managed to considerably weaken the Venetian presence in Matia.

² G.S. Dimitrioska, "Monastery complex of St. George - Knežino", MAA, 307-321, 307.

³ Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881-1938), born in Macedonia, was a Turkish army officer, revolutionary, and founder of the modern Republic of Turkey, serving as its first president from 1923 until his death in 1938. His surname, Atatürk (meaning "Father of the Turks"), was granted to him in 1934 and forbidden to any other person by the Turkish parliament.

⁴ The name of the city of 'Leshi' on the Adriatic coast in the region of Matia (today northern "Albania") means 'a corpse', cadaver, "Lesh" in plain Macedonian; also known by the corrupted Latin form of its name: 'Alessio', and in the 19th century as 'Alise', 'Lissus', 'Leshi', or 'Mrtav' (from Catholic Encyclopedia).

⁵ the name of the city and lake Skadar, also "Scutari" or "Škodra" [archaic] means 'stork' in plain Macedonic; see also "Škoda", the brand name of famous Czech car producer. Namely, even today the shallow lake Skadar is literary swarmed by storks.

Despite these efforts, on 31st of July, after almost three months under Turkish siege, the garrison of Svetigrad surrendered due to a cut-off in the water supply. The garrison was spared by the Turks and a force of Ottoman Janissaries was stationed inside the fortress instead. Two years later, Murat would march against Kruša, only to suffer a heavy defeat. His successor Mehmed II also couldn't subjugate Matia while Skanderbeg was alive, even though he twice (1466 and 1467) led the Ottoman armies himself against Kruša (today 'Krujë').

The prelude

In 1444 the major komites and voivodas of the western Macedonian duchies and principalities, which up to that point had been vassals of the Ottoman empire or Venetians and Ragusans, united and formed the League of Leshi (lat. Lissus, Alessio, Lezhe, etc.)⁶. Among the Macedonian nobles that attended the formation of the league were George Arianitski, Paul Dukagjini, Atanas Thopia, Aleksander ‘Leko’ Dushmani, Todor Kruna, Petar Spani, Aleksandar ‘Leko’ Zaharia, and Paul ‘Strez’⁷ Balshić. For the Chelnik (leader) of the confederation was chosen George ‘Skanderbeg’ Kastriot of Kruša.

Above: the modern Coat of Arms of the city of Lesh (Leche, Lezhe, Lissus)

Thus, to fight the Turk invaders they formed a large Macedonian confederation under command of one of the medieval Macedonian heroes and freedom fighters, George “Skander-beg” Kastriot, in Cyrillic: Ѓорѓе Скандербег Кастриот; in 1450 his full name in Old Macedonic Cyrillic was written as Ђурѣђ Кастриот – “Đurađ Kastriot” (Latin form of the surname, Castrioti, and also as Castriothi in 1408, is rendered later in modern Albanian historiography as Kastrioti).⁸ Charles du Fresne 1610–1688, writing in Latin, used ‘Georgius Castriotus Scanderbegus’ in his work. C.C. Moore in his biographical work on Skanderbeg (1850) used Castriot).

⁶ The name of the city of ‘Leshi’ on the Adriatic coast in the region of Matia (today northern “Albania”) has two possible etymological explanations: or it’s connected to the Macedonic forest spirit or forest god (Leši, Lesse, Veles - also a city in Macedonia), or simply means ‘a corpse’, ‘cadaver’ - “Lesh” in plain Macedonian.

⁷ “Strez” - a medieval title in Macedonia; a Herzog; ‘liege lord’, vassal governor of a small region. In the states where there were kings they were regularly the military commanders.

⁸ Gjergj is also the new modern Albanian version of the name George.

Born in Christian Macedonian family⁹ as a kid he was recruited in the dreaded Janiçari Corps (Turkish: “Yani-čari” - ‘Young troops’). After brilliant military career, and after exerting even a diplomatic function in the Russo-Turkish negotiations, at some point he deserted from the Turkish army and returned to his family in Matia.¹⁰ This was due to his national awakening, while he was participating as Macedonian translator in the Russo-Turkish negotiations. He was impressed by the grandeur and power of the Russian state, which provoked a bitter rancor to him, as a Macedonian in service of his own occupator. Thus, he deserted and decided instead to fight his former masters, the Turkish foreigners that usurped his homeland. From then on he fought the Turks fearlessly and with so much ardor that in his time he earned the nickname “Skander-beg” - ‘Alexander-lord’, as the Turks called him because of the stunning vehemence and fierce boldness of his attacks with which he terrorized them. According to Turks Skanderbeg military stratagems were comparable only to one another Macedonian - Alexander the Great. Skanderbeg compared himself to Pyrrhus of Epirus of antiquity who marched into Italy to defend the Macedonian city-states from Roman expansion. The Macedonians, for not so noble reasons, nicknamed him “Kastriot” i.e. “The castrated one”, due to the fact that all Janissary children recruits were forcibly islamized, thus circumcised (i.e. ‘castrated’¹¹), so, among equals they jokingly called him ‘Kastriot’.

Above: the Coat of Arms of George 'Skanderbeg' Kastriot, as recorded by Angelo Maria da Bologni in 1715

Skanderbeg also participated with his military expedition in the Franco-Spanish Italian War (1460-1462) on the side of his ally the Spanish king Ferdinand I of Naples. This was due to his rebellion against the Ottoman Empire, since 1443, when he allied with several Western European monarchs in ⁹Skanderbeg's father was Jovan (John; his grandfather Paul, grand-grandfather Komnen, grand-grand-grandfather Branilo), a landlord of a province that included Matia, Mirdite and Debar in today northern and central Albania and western Macedonia. His mother was Voisava, from the Polog valley (today northwestern Republic of Macedonia), most probably a Macedonian princess of the Branković dynasty. George was the youngest son, his older brothers were Staniša, Repoš and Kostandin, and his sisters were Mara, Jelena, Angelina, Vlayka and Mamica, all typically Macedonic names.

¹⁰ Skanderbeg deserted the army of Murat II in early November 1443, during the Battle of Niš, while fighting against the crusaders of John Hunyadi. According to some earlier sources, Skanderbeg deserted the Ottoman army during the Battle of Kunovitsa on 2 January 1444, Skanderbeg quit the field along with other 300 Macedonians serving in the Ottoman army.

¹¹ from the Macedonic verb “Kastri” - cuts, cropping (Lat. Castrare).

order to obtain assistance and to consolidate his domains. To repay his debt toward Alfonso (Ferdinand's I father) for the financial and military assistance given to him in the years before, Skanderbeg took up the pope's pleas to help out Alfonso's son by sending a military expedition of 500 Macedonian cavalry to Italy. This ties with the papal state and other western kingdoms also says a lot about his religious affiliation. Although it is presumed that he was of Orthodox Christian credo¹², because the region of Matia was still part of the Diocese of Macedonia (Orosh eparchy), it is noted that he was in close relationship with Catholic church too. Also, both pope Calixtus II and his successor Pius II supported him financially, while planning a crusade against Turks. Because of his merits in the war against the Turks pope Calixtus even gave to Skanderbeg the title Captain-General of the Curia.¹³

Above: the portraits of Skanderbeg and his wife Donka

Furthermore, already Skanderbeg's father Jovan had gained privileges and relations with the Republic of Ragusa and the Republic of Venice. In 1438 and 1439, Skanderbeg, together with his brother Staniša, continued to sustain his father's relations with those states. Thus, he also signed an alliance with Venice, which has been preparing for war against the Ottomans. In order to reinforce his ambitions, and to boost this shaky alliance, Skanderbeg seized the Shat fortress from a local Turkish vassal and presented it as a gift to Venice. On their side, seeing that southern Italy was locked in feud conflict Venice no longer feared that Aragonese-Matian alliance will pose them a threat to act more deliberately, and the Senate decided to take a friendlier approach in Venetian relations with Skanderbegs principality. When Skanderbeg finally established an alliance with Venice immediately used it against Dukagjini, a local landlord that was strengthening an alliance with the Turks. Even the pope issued a bull against Dukagjini, giving him 15 days to break his alliance with the Ottomans and to reconcile with Skanderbeg, or be subject to interdiction. Dukagjini conceded and chose the former option. He then reestablished his alliance with Skanderbeg and Venice and accepted all of its losses.

¹² Both his father Jovan and his brother Repoš, who served as monk there, are buried in the Holy Mountain (Sveta Gora) monastery of Hilendar.

¹³ the papal court at the Vatican, by which the Roman Catholic Church is governed. It comprises various Congregations, Tribunals, and other commissions and departments.

The League of Leshi was actually formed under the Venetian patronage and motivated by their regional interests. The Skanderbeg military campaign against his former masters started in March 1444, when under his leadership, in just 12 days and in two major battles - at Konyuh (today Elbasan) and Belgrad (today Berat), the region of Matia (or Mat, along the homonymous river)¹⁴ and parts in Upper Debar region with Svetigrad, were liberated from the Turkish yoke. Then after Skanderbeg attacked the Turks near Skopje, where according to sources he slew to death some 1,700 Turks. This event was perceived with bitter awe by the Turks, and they immediately sought to put an end of the rebellion with army force of some 40,000 soldiers sent from Odrin. At the end of June 1444, under command of Ali-pasha, the Turkish army headed toward the Debar region in order to attack the city of Svetigrad. But, they were unexpectedly engaged in open battle in the Debar field near the Torvioll, and then directly attacked by Skanderbeg's 12,000 strongmen. By lightning-strikes of the small but lethal Macedonian battle groups Turks suffered great losses. Then Skanderbeg, in the same fashion as his ancient predecessor Filip II of Macedon, exploiting Ali Pasha's disdain for the Macedonian army, lured into a trap the Turks by making it appear he was at a terrain disadvantage. Like Filip II he managed to trick the Turks by faking a retreat on one of his flanks. This was enough to dislocate the frontline of the Ottoman attack and then to concentrate a superior Macedonian force attack at a specific weakened point on the battlefield, in the same way as the Filip's son Alexander the Great did in the field of Chaeronea in 338 BCE. The Turk lines crushed under the sudden fierce charge of Macedonians and they couldn't escape their ill fate. In Turkish chronicles from that time is noted: "Skanderbeg cut-off all the exits and all the roads were blocked by insurmountable obstacles." The battle lasted just three hours, and Turks suffered a major defeat and lost some 30,000 men¹⁵, which remained slain on the battlefield.

This event caused even greater rancor and dread among the Turks. All the Ottoman expeditions into western Macedonia that followed after had failed, and as a result of all this the Ottomans abandoned their plans for major invasion on Hungary, and sought to crush the League of Leshi and re-establish the control over western parts of Macedonia, Matia and Epirus. Sultan Murat II chose to personally lead a major army force through Macedonian territory in order to defeat and conquer these rebel Macedonian principalities. Thus, the sultan decided first to capture the fortress and local city of Svetigrad (Saint-city), which stood on his way to Matia and Epirus. This invincible fortress served as spiritual center and a strategic outpost for protection of the Macedonian western regions as from the antiquity, while also allowing the Macedonians to launch their own assaults in the eastern Turk-occupied Macedonian territories.

¹⁴ Mat or Matka, river in today central-northern Albania. The same Macedonian name is also used for the famous canyon Matka on the river Treska near Skopje, today capital city of Republic of Macedonia.

¹⁵ The number of casualties is probably exaggerated, but that's the number reported by different medieval sources.

Above: a map showing Western Macedonia and the region of Matia (Mat). Note the typical Macedonic pair-named toponyms: Has - Ras (principality of Raška), Podrima - Zadrina (respectively “Along the Drim” and “Behind the Drim”)¹⁶, Black Drim - White Drim (the rivers), Dibri - Dibra, Matia - Dalmatia (in northwest), etc.

¹⁶ This toponym explicitly shows the etymological projection from the central Macedonian inland toward the western periphery, in this case from “Podrima” - ‘along the (river) Drim’ toward the “Zadrina” - ‘behind the (river) Drim’.

In that moment, in order to skip a new direct war with Turks, perfidious Venetians betrayed the League of Leshi. By turning their backs on the Macedonians, exactly when Murat II launched a decisive military operation, they left Skanderbeg and his komites and voivodas to confront the Turks virtually alone. So, unexpectedly, in the late 1447 also a conflict between Venice and the League of Leshi broke, but had not yet escalated into full-scale confrontation. Skanderbeg wasn't happy at all with the betrayal and had declared war on Venice as a result of a diplomatic impasse. It showed that the Venetians weren't any different from the Turks in their objectives toward the League of Leshi, and like the Turks they wanted to make Skanderbeg their vassal and his brave komites and voivodas Venetian servants. Thus Skanderbeg responded enraged by confronting the Venetians too. But, this left him vulnerable from the east.

In 1448 Macedonian spies informed Skanderbeg about the movements of the large Ottoman army that was preparing to march through Macedonia. By some sources the number of the Turks was reported as being as high as 170,000. However, this army is likely to have contained no more than 80,000 soldiers.

Murat II soon marched his huge army to city of Bitola, accompanied by his son Mehmed II. Skanderbeg urgently recalled for material and military aid Venice. The answer, as we know, was negative. Instead, the only aid received came from the Spanish kingdom of Naples and the Ragusans. Murat further marched into Ohrid, and along the valley of Black Drim river was approaching Svetigrad. In response, Skander-beg strengthened the garrisons of Kruša, Stellusha, Svetigrad and Belgrad (today “Berat”) by ordering the populations around these fortresses to take up arms. The count of Gyurritsa persuaded Skanderbeg to incorporate a scorched earth strategy, by destroying all supplies that might be used by the Ottoman army.

Shortly before the Ottoman siege began, Skander-beg positioned himself, with 8000 foot soldiers and 4000 cavalry, 7 miles (11 km) from the Turkish camp. He ordered that no campfires should be lit in order to keep his position secret. The great voivodas Moisie 'Golemi' (i.e. 'The Great') of Debar and Muzaka of Angelina were ordered, with thirty horsemen, to dress as peasants and try to enter the fortress. The plot was discovered and the company was attacked, but the attackers were driven off by the brave Macedonian fighters. In that moment, upon returning to the main Ottoman camp, one of the commanding pashas saw that this was one of Skanderbeg's plots and sent his 4,000 horsemen to find out where Skanderbeg was camping by following Moisie's band. Moisie led the Ottoman force straight into a valley where Skanderbeg, who was ready for such an enterprise, surrounded the valley with his forces waiting promptly the Turkish horsemen. When the Ottoman force was within distance, the Macedonians sprung the ambush and the Ottoman force was annihilated. This happened on May 14, 1448, after which Murat II ordered the siege to begin.

Above: a portrait of great voivoda Moisie Golemi (the Great) of Debar

The Siege

Ottoman arrival. - Murat's force contained approximately 80,000 men and two cannons, which could fire 200 pounds (91 kg) cannon balls. His army also contained a fresh corps of Janissaries, and 3000 debtors and bankrupts obligated to fight in order to regain their freedom. In charge of the Svetigrad defense was the voivoda Petar "Perlati" (the 'Conveyed' in Latin), renown Macedonian chieftain, with some 3000 strong men. Thus, in total, 15,000 Macedonians faced 80,000 Turks. The Ottoman force paraded around the fortress and offered 300,000 aspras (Turkish currency) to those who would open the gate and let the Ottoman army in the fortress without a fight. The heralds proposing these offers went into the fortress at night time and the garrison commanders gave them a splendid dinner, so that they would get the impression that the enemy was well prepared for a lengthy siege. After the dinner their offers were rejected and they were sent back to the sultan. The size of the Ottoman army troubled Skanderbeg because of the effects it could have on the morale of his soldiers and on the local population which supported the fighters. Skanderbeg thus moved from village to village, disguised as a common soldier, and invoked the fighting spirit of the population. As a result of this activity, even if heavily outnumbered, the local chieftains agreed to fight the Turks and persuaded Skanderbeg to draw up his plans in concert with theirs.

Above: Macedonian foot soldiers and horsemen from 15th century

Macedonian guerrilla attacks

To relieve the garrison of Svetigrad, Skanderbeg continually harassed the Turkish army. Many of these attacks had been surprise ambushes of isolated Ottoman forces. Hoping to evade Turkish patrols, Skanderbeg moved towards the Ottoman camp. On June 22, he led a night attack on the Ottoman camp which disillusioned the Turkish soldiers who had been expecting an easy campaign. Soon after, when the besiegers were taking their afternoon naps, Skanderbeg sent Moisie Golemi with some men, again dressed as peasants, inside the Ottoman camp to reconnoiter for a future assault. Skanderbeg spoke to his troops, encouraging them not to take booty from the camp as this might give the Ottoman forces time to react and launch a counterattack. That night, the Macedonians launched another attack, but the noise of the armor and the neighing of the horses inhibited a complete surprise. The periphery of the camp was thrown into confusion, but the bulk of the Turkish troops gathered and organized the defense, pushing the Macedonians out of the camp, but not before suffering heavy casualties.

To prevent further attacks of this sort, Murat detached a contingent of troops under Feruz Pasha to watch for the Macedonians. But, Feruz showed to be prone to desertion and thoroughly destroyed the sultan's plan, with part of the Murat's baggage train being captured.

At some point a breach in the walls of Svetigrad was made, but the following infantry assault was promptly repulsed by Macedonians. The bravery and endurance of the defenders of Svetigrad against the numerous enemy was tremendous.

Above: attack of the Turkish Janičari troops

The stalemate

The Macedonians, seeing the successful warfare of Skanderbeg, and that the defense of Svetigrad was holding for such a long time, began to hope that the sultan would now decide to return with his army toward Edirne. The fighting had reached a stalemate and Murat II contemplated his next move. He was advised to pillage the countryside, but the surrounding fields had already been burned by Skanderbeg and his komites. But, the sultan decided to stop chasing detachments of Skanderbeg's cavalry men into the forests to prevent further casualties.

Mehmed II, Murat's son, even proposed leaving Svetigrad to strike Skanderbeg's hometown Kruša (today 'Kruje'). Murat sternly rejected this, reasoning that the supplies to take Svetigrad would have been wasted and that Kruša would be more even more strongly defended than Svetigrad. The sultan thus decided to remain at Svetigrad in an attempt to starve the garrison into submission. Meanwhile, the garrison under the leadership of Petar "Perlati" made several successful sorties against the Ottomans, in order to ease the encirclement and strengthen his soldiers' morale.

Surrender of the fortress

In the same time Skanderbeg has even been able to confront the Venetians in the west. While campaigning against Turkish forces at Svetigrad, Skanderbeg managed to inflict them a serious defeat on July 23, 1448, consistently weakening the Venetian power in Matia. The siege of Svetigrad continued, however, and Marin Barleti writes that the Turks finally bribed a soldier to throw a dead dog into the well of the fortress, forcing the garrison to refuse to drink out of it. It is more likely, however, that the Ottomans had cut off the water supply and induced the garrison to surrender. Given the circumstance, voivoda Petar 'Perlati' promised a surrender if the garrison were allowed a safe passage through the Ottoman lines. Prince Mehmed suggested that the garrison should be promised safe passage and then massacred, but Murat II rejected his son's proposal, in fear that the rebellion would only be spread and intensified through such an act. He wisely decided instead to let the garrisoning task force safely to return to its leader Skanderbeg.

On July 31, 1448, after two and a half months under siege, the garrison of Svetigrad surrendered. After the victory a Turkish name - "Kodžadzik" was given to the place, and it means exactly "the great battle". Waste graveyards in the surrounding field still testify the numerous casualties on both sides.

Above: the great voivoda Atanas Topiev or Topia

The aftermath

Once the fortress had been captured, Murat placed his own garrison of Janissaries and ordered his men to repair the walls. Petar 'Perlati' and his soldiers came to Skanderbeg, begging for mercy. Skanderbeg pardoned his soldiers for the surrender and even thanked them for holding out for as long as they could. Skanderbeg continued to shadow the Ottoman army as it headed back home in the hopes of dealing some serious damage, but his forces were not strong enough to risk by provoking direct confrontation. In October of the same year, Murat II managed to inflict a serious defeat on John Hunyadi's forces in Kosovo Pole. Skanderbeg had planned to join Hunyadi's offensive with 20,000 men, but he was not able to get there in time due to the treacherous Turkish serf and vassal George Branković, who has blocked the roads to Kosovo Pole.

The loss of Svetigrad has further undermined the League of Leshi, and allowed to the Ottomans easy access into the region of Matia from east. They could now launch three coordinated invasions from south, southeast, and northeast into Epirus and Matia. A few weeks after the siege, Mustafa Pasha led 15,000 men into Matia, as requested by Skanderbeg's Venetian rivals, only to be heavily defeated with Mustafa being captured. Skanderbeg tried to regain Svetigrad the next year, but he did not have the proper artillery to do so. He surrounded the fortress, but he realized that his position was hopeless and lifted the siege. In early 1450 the Turks would take Belgrad (today 'Berat') through a night-time stratagem, and later that same year Murat II would besiege Kruša for first time, without success again.

Above: the city of Belgrad, i.e. 'White City' (today 'Berat') in Matia

Above: the siege of Kruša in 1450

Pope Pius II's declared a crusade against the Ottoman empire in November 1463, but to no avail, as the major European powers were reluctant to join the pope's crusade. Among those inquired were the city of Florence, Francisco Sforza of Milan, Louis XI of France, and Ferdinand I of Naples, all of whom declined for their own reasons.

In spring 1466, Sultan Murat's successor Mehmed II marched with a large Turkish army against the Macedonians and their leader, Skanderbeg, who had long resisted them and had repeatedly sought assistance from Italy. The major result of this campaign was the construction of the new Turkish fortress at Elbasan, allegedly within just 25 days. This strategically sited fortress, at the lowlands near the end of the old Via Egnatia, was yet another big step toward the complete Turkish occupation of Epirus, Matia and further in Dalmatia on the northwest. With this stronghold Turks separated Matia from Epirus, thus isolating Skanderbeg's base in the northern highlands from the Venetian holdings in the south. This, and the death of his greatest supporter, pope Pius II, who died before the planned crusade against Turks even began, left Skanderbeg to fight his battles virtually alone.

The Turks failed again to take Kruša, and they failed to subjugate the country. However, the winter brought an outbreak of plague, which would recur annually and sap the strength of the local resistance. Since no conventional weapons seemed to be able to kill him, Skanderbeg himself, same as his predecessor Alexander the Great, died of malaria in the then Venetian stronghold of Lissus (Lesh) in 1468. The lost of both pope Pius II and Skanderbeg left Venice without the ability to use him and warlords from Matia and Macedonia inland for its own advantage. The Macedonians were left to their own devices and were gradually subdued by Turks over the next decade. After. After Skanderbeg died and after 25 years of continuous Ottoman invasion principality of Matia fell under Turkish rule. Then Mehmed II personally led the siege of Shkodra in 1478-79, of which early Ottoman chronicler Aşıkpaşazade (1400–81) will wrote: "All the conquests of Sultan Mehmed were fulfilled with the seizure of Shkodra." The Venetians and Shkodrans resisted the assaults and continued to hold the fortress until Venice ceded Shkodra to the Ottoman empire in the Treaty of Constantinople as a condition of ending the war.

Above: map of Matia and Epirus with old Macedonic names of the cities used before 19th century